Description

The author hopes these exercises will prove interesting. They aim to give to descriptions of French life and scenes the human touch too often lacking in composition texts. Entertainment cannot, however, be the main consideration. To be useful, exercises must be practical. The word practical, as used here, means this: Exercises must supply abundant practice in the use of all constructions which the pupil studies. It is futile, for instance, to make him study partitive articles, and then include only two or three partitives in the corresponding exercises. Only when such constructions are abundant can the pupil learn to apply his rules correctly. Each lesson contains three sections. Section A consists of detached sentences affording copious illustrative material. Band Care in connected prose, but abound in the constructions the pupil has been studying. Cis somewhat more difficult than Band may be used either for additional practice, for alternate exercises, or for a second review course. In general it may be said that lessons can be readily divided, the order of sections changed, and the work otherwise adapted to the needs of the class. At the head of each lesson are given topics for grammatical study. No rules are printed, but subjects are assigned such as are treated in any good grammar. (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and don't occur in the book.)
